

Editorial

Ben Scully, Maurizio Atzeni, Neethi P, Nicolas Pons Vignon, Omar Manky Bonilla

The transition in the editorial board of the Global Labour Journal that has been underway for the past few months continues, and we would like to inform readers about some of these changes. We welcome two new editors, Teri Caraway and Elena Baglioni. Teri is a professor of Political Science at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis, USA. Her work focuses on comparative labour politics and the comparative political economy of labour. Elena is a reader in global supply chain management and sustainability at Queen Mary University of London. Her work focuses on global value chains and labour regimes, the labour process, social reproduction and ecology.

We also bid farewell to someone who has been a cornerstone of the Global Labour Journal's editorial team for almost a decade, the managing editor Karin Pampallis. Karin joined the Global Labour Journal in 2014 and has been a major part of the journal's growth and success over the past ten years. The whole community of the journal—including current and former editors, authors, reviewers, and readers—all owe Karin an enormous debt of gratitude for her dedication to the journal during her tenure. We wish her all the best in her future endeavours.

While we are sad to see Karin leave, we are thrilled to welcome Dr Claire Ceruti as the new managing editor of the journal. Claire is an experienced editor, having worked on the Global Labour Column for several years. She is also an accomplished labour scholar who has published on class and labour politics in South Africa with a focus on public sector workers. She recently completed her PhD in Sociology at the University of the Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, South Africa.