Books by Jan Dejnožka

All four great analysts are modified realists by analogy to Aristotle. For example, Quine's ideology of overlapping terms ("undetached rabbit parts," "rabbit time slices") is subsumed as distinctions of reason within his robust realism of non-overlapping really distinct portions of the world (the rabbit portion, the cow portion). Frege and Russell pioneered 58 'no entity without identity' theses and 29 private language arguments. Wittgenstein and Quine are derivative.

"Combined with a precise, transparent style of writing, the book is a treat to read. Particularly impressive are the novel insights and deeper interpretations which the author gives of the four analysts...a fine thought-provoking piece of research." Wayne A. Patterson, Australasian Journal of Philosophy 75/4, December 1997, 543–44.

"[It] is more than fair to say that Dejnožka offers a daring re-reading of the analytic tradition...[M]any challenging ideas and innovative interpretations await the earnest reader on each page." Bob Barnard, Bertrand Russell Society Quarterly 100, November 1998, 33–35.

"The author shows that the published Russell is capable of new interpretations; in particular, that modal notions such as possibility have a greater place in various aspects of his logical and philosophical thought than has previously been imagined." Ivor Grattan-Guinness, founding editor, History and Philosophy of Logic.
